I am Kevin Kelly, radical techno-optimist and co-founder of Wired magazine. AMA!

JOURNALIST submitted 1 year ago * by kevin2kelly

I built my own house, rode a bike across the US twice, kept bees, homeschooled my son, hitchhiked in Japan, started three businesses, launched the first Hackers' Conference, the Quantified Self movement, and now self-published a book of Cool Tools. AMA.

I am now closing the session. Thanks Reddit for the great questions.

I think the Circle is both brilliant and profound. I think the book will take its place alongside 1984 and Brave New World. It doesn't have much chance of happening, but it is a cautionary tale to keep us honest.

Singapore. I am half Asian now and Singapore is one of the few cities in Asia I could imagine living in. It's vibrant, but still works, and it is far greener than you'd think. It's not Disneyland with the death penalty.

Hey Kevin! Some questions of mine, feel free to answer some or all:

- 1.) How has the internet (or tech in general) of today surprised you compared to your expectations from the early days of Wired and the Well.
- 2.) What's your opinion of bitcoin?
- 3.) Do you think the maker movement and interest in all things cool tools is the start of a new personal manufacturing industry (similar to the PC revolution) or is it just for tinkerers and hobbyists?
- 4.) As a fellow spiritual person, I feel the silicon valley brand of transhumanist futurism (the dominant vision of the future for many techno-progressives) is too materialistic and devoid of what William James called 'religious experience'. Any thoughts on rational spirituality moving forward?

[\[-\]](#) kevin2kelly [\[S\]](#) 4 points 1 year ago

1) We did not really get how much of the web would be user generated. 2) The principles of Bitcoin (block chains, etc.) will be very disruptive. It makes money a type of communication instead of value. 3) I think makers will shift the manufacturing landscape. 4) I bet there will be new religions around technology, someday.

In a tweet, you once suggested that content we have today, say on Facebook and Twitter, will be gone in 25 or 50 years. Are you confident these companies will not be around and/or transition? Also, are you able to provide brief, clear, simple vision of how laypersons might expect to reliably store data in next 25 years? Thanks for consideration.

Seems to be out of stock now before it got out of the USA, and the $999 speculators are now active. Any reprints planned?

Hi Kevin,

First of all, thank you for taking the time to answer questions. I have been a reader of WIRED for quite a few years and love what you folks do!

I would like to draw your attention to The Technocopia Project. We are a new Hackerspace in MA that is focused on fully automating sustainable manufacturing from the plants up.

“ The Technocopia Project is the outline of the long term goals of Technocopia. Explicitly, Technocopia intends to support the development of open-source technology that will allow any individual, family, or community to sustainably and independently satisfy their own humanitarian needs. We define these needs loosely as things like (but not limited to): nutritious food, clean water, shelter, electricity, medicine, free access to knowledge (i.e. access to the internet), etc.. The general plan is outlined, as follows:

- Build the tools that build all tools.
- Create an independent and sustainable source(s) of all required raw materials and energy.
- Refine these sustainably sourced raw materials into usable materials.

- Encapsulate these three parts into one integrated prototype factory unit, called "Prometheus".
- Use Prometheus to replicate itself.
- Distribute these child units to locally, and support them until they are self sustaining.
- Use the children to replicate themselves, distributing them nationally and globally.
- Enjoy relative global abundance, peace and prosperity. >While on the surface this plan may seem far fetched, we can assure you that every piece of technology required by this plan to succeed has, in fact, already been invented and developed, in one form or another. The "only" thing we have to do is take all of these technologies and blend them together and implement them in a way that empowers individuals, families, and communities.

My question is, how do you see automation of the workforce transitioning to post-scarcity(if at all)?

[\[-\]](#) kevin2kelly [\[S\]](#) 6 points 1 year ago

Automation of work will create new scarcities while filling the world with plentitude in other ways. New scarcities will be such things as human attention, human relations, silence, errors, questions.

permalink parent

[\[-\]](#) hephaestusness 3 points 1 year ago

How then might you imagine displaced service workers surviving? Should every have an automatic right to the plentitude? We think so and are using the open source model as applied to manufacturing. As a roboticist whose works has been used in everything from manufacturing to neurosurgery i have watched closely the steady displacement of the workforce by various pieces of automation. It seems to me that now is the time to begin questioning the idea of scarcity based economics, and to begin to discuss what comes after that. It seems like a horrifying distopia to suggest that everyone will be forced to sell ones attention just to survive...

If that is not what you are suggesting, then the discussion of rights to the surplus needs to be addressed.

permalink parent

Is it possible for the Technium to produce a technology that will destroy all other tech and its creators? Or is it inherently a good force that in aggregate does good?

Hi Kevin, What are your views towards ephemeral media, such as Snapchat? Do you think that, looking forward to our own future as well as the generations below us, that we need to begin setting 'data expiration' dates on the content that we post on the Web? It seems as if the current self self-censors in the present as well as the future in order to properly contextualise the content that they are putting on the web. Viktor M.S. firmly argues that humans natural ability to forget needs to be (re)introduced to the digital age. Would be great to hear your thoughts. Olly Osborne.

[\[-\]](#) kevin2kelly [\[S\]](#) 1 point 1 year ago

I am glad Snapchat is there. As an option. I'd like to see other options for ephemeral media, or continuous degrees of communication. How about a way to whisper online? But I think these will always be just part of the media ecosystem, and maybe not the central part.

I drove a prototype Tesla, and I was impressed by its power. It was almost scary. I think they'll work out the battery issues. I have no bet on Tesla, but I would bet on electric cars for the long term. In China, electric scooters are the norm.

Hi Kevin, this Dave from the fiberglass shop in Lancaster. What is your view on the future of 3D printing as an industry? Would you think it wise to start a business of that nature?

Yes, I think 3D printing could be make into a business today. The proliferation of home models will only fuel the need for professionals. But this will be a horrifically fast-paced business, with constant obsolescence. Then again, folks like you might be able to located a quiet niche -- maybe like repairing 3D printers!

I may call you tomorrow to pick your brain on the feasibility of institutional grade printers, as I am flying to the west coast to meet a team of engineers. There is a first time for everything. Even flying, ;)

What does it takes for a foreigner to write in an american magazine? Is there any other way of learning their textual structure that it is not reading?

It's tough. I am sadly monolingual, so I can't help.

Having homeschooled your children, have you come to any principles about when to introduce technology and how much? Should children try to have an analog experience prior to a certain age?

Like a lot of parents we limit access to certain time periods, and to certain ages. Those may shift as we learn more about specific technologies but the idea remains.

Hi Kevin,

I read your book "Out of Control" years back, and it was the main catalyst for me enrolling at university and studying biology and philosophy. Thankyou!

Would you care to revisit the themes of that book, and comment on what you think may have significantly changed since you wrote it?

What Fiction books are you reading at the moment?

I was wondering if you could briefly summarise your religious beliefs, and how they intersect with your technological beliefs?

And how do you like living in Pacifica? I recently moved to San Francisco and often think about moving there as I spend a lot of time surfing there!

I loved 'What Technology Wants', especially the bits about the Amish.

Keep up the good work!

Hey Kev,

What long and short term technological solutions have you conceived of to ameliorate the terrible air quality in China?
